Part B — In-Class Activity

Activity 1 — Response or Reaction?: Mark each statement as belonging to Response or to Reaction.

Statement	Response / Reaction
You decide your feeling on your own right	Response
You decide your feeling based on the behaviour of the other	Reaction
Your feeling is definite and unconditional	Response
If the other misbehaves, you also misbehave	Reaction
Your ‘remote control’ is with others	Reaction
You decide your own behaviour; you are self-organised	Response

Activity 2 — Lack of Intention or Lack of Competence?

For each event, decide whether it shows a lack of intention or a lack of competence, and write one line of reasoning.

Event	Intention / Competence	Reason
The boy shouts back at his mother	Lack of intention	He intended to be disrespectful, not lacking the ability to control his tone.
The doctor did not reach Shruti on time (he stopped for an accident victim)	Lack of competence	He had the intention to help but lacked the competence to manage time effectively due to an unforeseen emergency.
You came late to the workshop	Lack of intention	You did not intend to be late; you lacked the intention to plan your schedule properly.
Someone takes away your mobile	Lack of intention	The thief intended to steal; it is a lack of intention (to respect others' property) on the thief's part.

Part C — Long-Answer Questions

Q1. Distinguish response from reaction. Why does the deck say that in response "you are self-organised" while in reaction "your remote control is with others"? [5]

Response is a conscious, deliberate action based on understanding and natural acceptance, where you are in control of your thoughts and actions. Reaction is an automatic, impulsive behavior triggered by external stimuli, often driven by preconditioning or sensation. The deck says in response "you are self-organised" because you act from your own inner clarity and harmony, not dependent on others. In reaction, "your remote control is with others" because your emotional state and behavior are dictated by external events or people, making you lose self-regulation.

Q2. Explain, using the events in the film, the difference between lack of intention and lack of competence. [5]

Lack of intention means a person chooses not to do what is right, even though they have the ability; for example, in the film, the boy shouting back at his mother shows he intended to be rude, not that he lacked the skill to speak politely. Lack of competence means a person wants to do the right thing but fails due to insufficient skill or knowledge; for example, the doctor who stopped for an accident victim intended to help Shruti but lacked the competence to manage time and priorities effectively. Thus, intention is about will, while competence is about capability.

Q3. On what three bases do people decide, and which one leads to definite, self-organised conduct? [5]

People decide on three bases: preconditioning (past conditioning), sensation (immediate pleasure or pain), and self-verification on natural acceptance (understanding based on one's own innate right feeling). Self-verification on natural acceptance leads to definite, self-organised conduct because it is based on one's own inner clarity and harmony, not on external influences or fleeting sensations.

Q4. From your own interactions, estimate the percentage of time you are responding versus reacting, and state what effort is required to move from reaction to response. [5]

From my own interactions, I estimate I am responding about 30% of the time and reacting about 70% of the time. To move from reaction to response, I need to practice self-awareness, pause before acting, and consciously verify my decisions against my natural acceptance rather than acting on impulse or preconditioning. Regular reflection and mindfulness can help increase the proportion of response over time.

Self-Reflection (Take-Home)

• What percentage of your decisions are motivated by preconditioning, by sensation, and by self-verification on natural acceptance? (Slide 11)

• What do you need to do so that all your decisions are motivated by your natural acceptance? (Slide 11)

• Approximately 50% of my decisions are motivated by preconditioning, 30% by sensation, and 20% by self-verification on natural acceptance.

• To have all my decisions motivated by natural acceptance, I need to continuously practice self-reflection, question my preconditioned patterns, and align my choices with my innate sense of rightness and harmony, as taught in the course.
