Part B — In-Class Activity

Activity 1: Fill the grid for one person (a family member or friend). Answer Yes/No for intention and for competence.

	Intention (wants to...)	Competence (is able to...)
make myself happy	Yes	Yes
make the other happy	Yes	No
the other → make self happy	Yes	Yes
the other → make me happy	Yes	No

Activity 2: Mark each statement as Trust (based on understanding) or Dependability (based on events).

Statement	Trust / Dependability
I can see the other intends to make me happy, even if competence is absent	Trust
The last 5 times I lent her money she returned it on time, so I can rely on her	Dependability
He said 11 but came after 12, he always comes late, so how can I rely on him	Dependability
My acceptance of the other is definite and unconditional	Trust

Activity 3: For each question, mark whether it is about Intention or Competence.

Question	Intention / Competence
Do you ever intend to be angry?	Intention
Do you sometimes become angry?	Competence

Part C — Long-Answer Questions

Q1. Define trust. What two things are being evaluated when we evaluate trust between two individuals? [5]

Trust is the definite and unconditional acceptance of the other as one wants to make oneself happy and also wants to make the other happy. When evaluating trust between two individuals, we evaluate their intention (whether they want to make the other happy) and their competence (whether they are able to make the other happy).

Q2. What is the “common mistake in relationship” regarding intention and competence? [5]

The common mistake is to doubt the other's intention when the other lacks competence. We tend to assume that if the other is not able to make us happy, it means they do not want to make us happy. This leads to misunderstanding and conflict, whereas the other's intention is always to make us happy, but their competence may be lacking.

Q3. Distinguish trust from dependability. [5]

Trust is based on understanding the other's intention — it is definite and unconditional, independent of past events. Dependability is based on observed events and past behavior — it is conditional and can change with circumstances. Trust is about the other's wanting to make me happy, while dependability is about the other's ability to do so consistently.

Q4. “Same natural acceptance in all, differences only in competence.” Explain, and state what trust on intention means. [5]

Every human being naturally accepts that they want to be happy and want others to be happy. This intention is the same in all. Differences arise only in competence — the ability to actually make others happy. Trust on intention means being assured that the other wants to make me happy, regardless of their competence. This trust is unconditional and continuous.

Q5. Using the eight questions, evaluate your trust on the intention of one family member or friend. Recall what you do when the other lacks competence — try to improve their competence, or get irritated and angry? [5]

I evaluated my trust on the intention of my mother. I see that she wants to make herself happy, wants to make me happy, and wants me to make myself happy. She also wants me to make her happy. Her intention is always to make me happy, even if sometimes she is not able to do so. When she lacks competence, I try to improve her competence by patiently explaining and helping her, rather than getting irritated or angry. This is because I trust her intention.

Self-Reflection (Take-Home)

• How many persons, in your family and friends, do you have trust on intention — unconditional and continuous? (Slide 31)

• Where would you start — expecting or demanding trust from the other, or making effort to develop the feeling of trust in yourself and express it? (Slide 34)

• I have unconditional and continuous trust on the intention of 3 persons in my family and friends.

• I would start by making effort to develop the feeling of trust in myself and express it, rather than expecting or demanding trust from the other.
