How to Engage with this Worksheet / ● Whatever is stated here (and in the lecture) is a proposal — do not assume it to be true or false. / ● Verify it on your own right, on the basis of your natural acceptance, and validate it in your living. / ● Treat each question as a dialogue: first between you and the material, and then within your own Self — between what you are and what you really want to be.

I will treat the content as a proposal, not as truth, and verify it through my own natural acceptance and living. I will engage with each question as a dialogue, first with the material and then within myself, comparing what I am with what I truly want to be.

Part A — Key Ideas (Recap)

• Respect = right evaluation. The right evaluation of a human being is on the basis of the Self — right evaluation of intention (natural acceptance) and right evaluation of competence (the portion of imagination guided by natural acceptance).

• Wrong evaluation is of three kinds: over-evaluation (to evaluate for more than what it is), under-evaluation (less than what it is) and otherwise-evaluation (other than what it is). Any wrong evaluation is disrespect and is not naturally acceptable.

• Minimum content of respect: our purpose (natural acceptance) is the same, our program (to understand and live in harmony at all levels of being) is the same, and our potential is the same — therefore the other is similar to me.

• Complete content of respect: the other is similar to me, and we are complementary to each other; the only difference is in our level of understanding (competence). If the other has more understanding, I am committed to learn from them; if I have more, I live with responsibility unconditionally and am committed to facilitate understanding in the other (once they are assured in relationship).

• Differentiation — evaluating on the basis of body, physical facility or belief (preconditioning), and so comparing, competing and accentuating differences — is disrespect; it leads to manipulation and exploitation.

• Competence and skills are complementary (competence plays the larger role). Full human potential is the same for all and is the basic reference. Appreciation (for the part completed) plus motivation (for the part yet to be completed), with clarity of full potential, is the right way — unlike over- or otherwise-evaluation.

Respect is right evaluation of the Self: intention (natural acceptance) and competence (imagination guided by natural acceptance). Wrong evaluation includes over-, under-, and otherwise-evaluation, all of which are disrespect. Minimum respect: the other is similar to me in purpose, program, and potential. Complete respect: we are complementary, differing only in competence; I learn from those with more understanding and facilitate those with less. Differentiation based on body, physical facility, or belief is disrespect and leads to manipulation. Competence and skills are complementary; appreciation and motivation with clarity of full potential is the right approach.

Part B — In-Class Activity

Activity 1: For each statement, mark Right, Over, Under or Otherwise evaluation.

Statement	Right / Over / Under / Otherwise
'You are special, you can do anything, sky is the limit'	Over evaluation
Calling an under-performing child 'a donkey'	Under evaluation

Statement	Right / Over / Under / Otherwise
Assuming a human being = Body	Otherwise evaluation
Seeing the other as similar at the level of purpose, program and potential, and defining complementarity at the level of competence	Right evaluation

Activity 2: Fill the three things that are the same for all human beings, and the conclusion.

- 1. Desire (Natural Acceptance) is the same
- 2. Program is the same
- 3. Potential is the same
- Therefore: the other is similar to me.

Activity 3: List the features of each, as given in the deck.

- Differentiation (basis: body / physical facility / preconditioning): Based on body, physical facility, or preconditioning; leads to comparison, competition, conflict; sees others as unequal or inferior/superior.
- Respect (on the basis of the Self): Based on the Self (consciousness); recognizes the other as similar in purpose, program, and potential; defines complementarity at the level of competence; leads to harmony and mutual fulfillment.

Part C — Long-Answer Questions

Q1. Define respect as right evaluation, and explain the three kinds of wrong evaluation. [5]

Respect is right evaluation, meaning seeing the other as they are — similar at the level of the Self (purpose, program, potential) and complementary at the level of competence. The three kinds of wrong evaluation are: (1) Over evaluation — attributing more to a person than they actually are, e.g., saying 'you can do anything'; (2) Under evaluation — attributing less to a person than they actually are, e.g., calling someone 'a donkey'; (3) Otherwise evaluation — evaluating on a wrong basis, e.g., assuming a human being is only the body.

Q2. What is the minimum content of respect? Why are all human beings “similar”? [5]

The minimum content of respect is that all human beings are similar in three things: (1) Desire (Natural Acceptance) — everyone wants happiness and fulfillment; (2) Program — everyone wants to live in harmony and continuity; (3) Potential — everyone has the capacity to realize their natural acceptance. All human beings are similar because these three are universal across all humans, regardless of body, culture, or preconditioning.

Q3. What is the complete content of respect, and what is the only difference between human beings? [5]

The complete content of respect includes the minimum content (similarity in desire, program, and potential) plus the recognition of complementarity at the level of competence. The only difference between human beings is their competence — their skills, knowledge, and abilities — which varies from person to person. Respect means accepting the similarity at the level of the Self while being complementary at the level of competence.

Q4. Distinguish respect from differentiation. [5]

Respect is based on the Self (consciousness) and recognizes the other as similar in purpose, program, and potential, leading to harmony and complementarity. Differentiation is based on the body, physical facility, or preconditioning, and leads to comparison, competition, and conflict. Respect sees equality at the level of the Self, while differentiation creates a sense of superiority or inferiority based on external factors.

Q5. Reflect on the members of your family or your friends: do you do right, over, under or otherwise evaluation of their competence? Do you see them as similar to you, and how can you be more complementary? [5]

I sometimes do over evaluation of my younger sibling's abilities, expecting them to excel in everything, and under evaluation of a friend's cooking skills. I generally see them as similar to me in wanting happiness and harmony. To be more complementary, I can appreciate each person's unique competence without comparison, offer help where my skills are stronger, and learn from them where they are more skilled, thus creating a mutually fulfilling relationship.

Self-Reflection (Take-Home)

• In day-to-day living, do you accept the other as being similar to you, or do you try to show that you are special, unique, different? (Slide 10)

• Given the different levels of competence in your family, what program can you make to be complementary with each member? (Slide 24)

• In day-to-day living, I often catch myself trying to show that I am special or different, especially in academic or social settings. However, I am learning to accept that others are similar to me in their desire for happiness and their potential, and I am working on seeing them as equals at the level of the Self.

• In my family, my mother is good at cooking and emotional support, my father is skilled at financial planning, and my sibling is good at technology. I can be complementary by helping with household chores, sharing my knowledge of health and wellness, and learning from each of them. My program is to have weekly family time where we share our strengths and support each other's growth.
