Part B — In-Class Activity

Activity 1: Fill the cycle beginning from the entry point.

Step	Part of human tradition	What it ensures
Entry point	Humanistic education	Competence to live with definite human conduct
2	Human conduct	Continuity of mutual happiness and prosperity
3	Universal human order	Society in which human goal is realised
4	Human constitution	Society living in mutual fulfilment / constitution

Activity 2: Compare the prevailing approach and the right-understanding-based approach.

Aspect	Prevailing approach only	Right-understanding-based approach
Main method	Codes / oaths / punishment / audit	Right understanding and ethical competence
Focus	Curbing ill effects	Ensuring right utilisation of skills for comprehensive human goal
Profession	Livelihood / wealth generation	Participation in the larger order for comprehensive human goal
Result expected	Temporary control	Sustainable ethical conduct and mutual fulfilment

Activity 3 – Design a Humanistic Education Feature

Choose one classroom/lab/project practice and add value education, value-based education and value-based living components.

Existing practice	Value education component	Value-based living practice
Group project on sustainable development	Discussing the role of harmony in nature and society	Students practice sharing resources and cooperating respectfully
Expected outcome	Students understand interconnectedness and responsibility	Students apply ethical living in daily interactions

Part C — Long-Answer Questions

1. Why is humanistic education called the entry point for human tradition? (5 marks)

Humanistic education is called the entry point for human tradition because it focuses on developing right understanding, right feelings, and ethical competence in individuals. It lays the foundation for a humane society by nurturing values like harmony, trust, and mutual respect. Without this education, the human tradition of living in harmony with self, others, and nature cannot be sustained.

2. Explain profession as participation in the larger order. (5 marks)

Profession is not merely a means of earning a livelihood but a way to participate in the larger order of society and nature. It involves using one's skills and knowledge to contribute to the well-being of others and the environment. When done with right understanding, a profession becomes a form of service that supports harmony and mutual fulfillment in the larger order.

3. Why are codes of conduct and punishment not sufficient by themselves? (5 marks)

Codes of conduct and punishment are external controls that may enforce compliance but do not develop inner ethical competence or right understanding. Without internal transformation, individuals may follow rules only out of fear, not conviction. True ethical behavior arises from natural acceptance and self-regulation, which cannot be achieved through punishment alone.

4. Suggest one classroom or lab feature that can support humanistic education. (5 marks)

One classroom feature is a 'reflection corner' where students spend 5 minutes at the end of each session writing about how the lesson connects to their own feelings, relationships, and responsibilities. This practice encourages self-awareness, empathy, and the application of values in daily life, supporting the goals of humanistic education.

Self-Reflection (Take-Home)

What is one change needed in education to develop ethical competence?

How can your profession become a means of your own evolution?

Where do you see the need for right understanding beyond rules and punishment?

One change needed is to include regular self-reflection and dialogue on values in the curriculum, rather than only teaching theoretical ethics. My profession can become a means of my own evolution by approaching it as a service that helps me grow in empathy, responsibility, and harmony with others. Right understanding is needed in situations where rules are absent or ambiguous, such as resolving interpersonal conflicts or making ethical decisions under pressure, where punishment alone cannot guide behavior.
